Museum Notes.

A small group of crude carborundum crystals has recently been presented to the Museum. This manufactured mineral looks much like "peacock coal", is next to diamond in hardness, and is being used extensively for all manner of sharpening tools. The secret of its manufacture was discovered by accident some ten years ago, but after its value was learned, the business of producing it developed rapidly. The first pound of carborundum sold for $450, but its price is now about 50 cents per pound.
